

Web site keeping America posted

The Smoking Gun gives the details behind scandals and crimes.

Michelle Megna
Knight Ridder

14 Mar 2003

NEW YORK — William Bastone and Daniel Green, co-founders of www.thesmokinggun.com. are guys who don't round things off. Ask how many visitors their expose Web site had in February they'll tell you: 4,756,767.

It's all in the details.

Consider the difference between reading in the news paper that, according to court documents, Michael Jackson allegedly molested a young boy, or reading a graphic account of a sexual act from the 13-year-old's 1993 deposition, which was posted on the Web site.

"It's a much more compelling narrative." Bastone says, dryly.

Remember Rick (Restoring Order) Rockwell of 'Who Wants to Marry a Multi-Millionaire?'"

What about bondage babe Sarah Kozer of "Joe Millionaire"?

The Smoking Gun broke those stories by posting the restraining order against Rockwell, as well as still[TEXT OBSCURED] the Kozer videos. It also [TEXT OBSCURED] Busta Rhymes' concert tract rider request for [TEXT OBSCURED] condoms backstage.

In fact, concert riders was such a hit with visitors of the site that Bastone and Green created a "Backstage" section that currently features [TEXT OBSCURED] acts. There you'll discover J.Lo must have designer [TEXT OBSCURED] dies, white drapes. white [TEXT OBSCURED]ture and white lilies in her dressing room.

But it's not just sensational tidbits that make the site successful. In addition to exposing celebrity foibles. It posts documents such as prison, police and medic examiner's records (such as those relating to the dea[TEXT OBSCURED] Malcolm X). A flight [TEXT OBSCURED] investigators believe was [TEXT OBSCURED] by the Sept. 11 terrorists [TEXT OBSCURED] also posted.

"You will always find [TEXT OBSCURED] thing at our site that you can't find anywhere else," says Bastone.

Washington Post med[TEXT OBSCURED] reporter Howard Kurtz believes that "The Smoking Gun has become a Journalists gold mine because it produces the one thing — raw documents — that every reporter needs to nail down a story. Journalists get hundreds of tips and rumors to check (and they don't) always have the time to go through dusty files to find supporting documents (such as memos and letters) for their stories."

Kurtz refers to the period in 2001 when a number of prominent Journalists wrote "embarrassing suck-up letters to (Unabomber) Ted Kaczynski" in an effort to get an exclusive interview. Kaczynski ultimately donated the pitch letters to the University of Michigan, which turned them over to The Smoking Gun. "That story never would have seen the light of day without the Gun site," says Kurtz.

Larry Pryor, professor of Journalism at USC's Annenberg School for Communication and executive editor of Online Journalism Review, says that print and broadcast media, constrained by space, time and advertisers* sensibilities, can miss the essence of a story by glossing over the details.

KRT photo

Smoking Gun's founders Daniel Green, front left, and William Bastone, front right, work with reporters Andrew Goldberg, left rear, and Joseph Jesselli to dig up newsworthy documents.

“I saw TV reporters who started to read the Jackson document, (but) because it was too graphic, they paraphrased (it) with ambiguous language,” Pryor says. “What works really well in online journalism is documents. The Smoking Gun had the whole deposition, made under oath. It’s sensational, but it isn’t gossip, and it leads the public to think we have a right to prosecution. Where’s the pA?” (A civil suit by the boy’s family was settled out of court.)

Before creating their niche in cyberspace, Bastone and Green worked in print: Bastone was a crime reporter for The Village Voice, and Green worked as a freelance magazine writer. As investigative journalists, the two accumulated a collection of FBI reports, court affidavits and memos.

They realized the powerful effect raw documents can have on readers — seeing an FBI “confidential” stamp makes you feel like you’re in on the discovery, part of the gumshoe game. In 1997, they first posted their collection on the Web, never expecting their project to become a full-time occupation.

“They’re good at fact-gathering and have a good sense of timing,” says Pryor. “They’re topical. And they’re focused on a specialized beat. That’s one reason why they’re capable of beating large organizations that have to focus on the bigger picture.”

Another plus is that it often takes less than 20 minutes from the time a document is discovered to confirm and post it, says Bastone, giving the site what amounts to a journalistic fast break.

Armed with little more than the Freedom of Information Act, help from two other reporters (Joseph Jessell and Andrew Goldberg), computers and scanners, Bastone and Green work in an office in the East 30s that was once Court TV’s mailroom. “We follow leads for months. Check court dockets, municipal records, things like that,” says Green.

Scott Pansky, president of the Entertainment Publicists Professional Society, disagrees. He thinks the site is more about digging up dirt than uncovering compelling facts. “They’re taking advantage of people in the limelight, and of the sensationalism of being a celebrity,” he says.

Regardless of the topic the site investigates, its approach remains the same. This focus is the main reason The Smoking Gun is still smoking. Bastone and Green say their site still looks and reads the way it did in 1997, when they launched it with a previously unpublished FBI report detailing Elvis Presley’s drug use.

After turning down offers to sell the company for stock at the height of the Internet boom, the Gun guys sold the business to Court TV in 2000. Their corporate parent makes Green show up for only one meeting a week; otherwise, they’re left alone. According to Bastone, Court TV is planning two half-hour specials this summer based on their material.

As for the site’s greatest hits, Bastone says, “Anything bad that’s related to a reality TV show came out of this office. We sort of lump all those together as our best stuff. It just never ends.”

It's not just PR reps who have been unhappy about The Smoking Guns popularity, though. Consider Jim Weir, a graphics designer in San Francisco.

His Web-design business, called Smoking Gun, resides at www.smokinggun.com (no "the"). This makes Weir the digital equivalent of the family with the phone number one digit off the local pizza parlor's.

Thanks to millions of people looking for The Smoking Gun, traffic to Weir's site has risen so much that his service provider is charging him extra.

And after getting some 3,376,831 visitors on Feb. 11, Weir posted his own memo: "There are no documents on Joe Millionaire, Michael Jackson or anyone else at this Web site. There never were. Don't E-mail asking where they are."

"He's called a few times to speak with us," Bastone says with a chuckle. "Maybe we should let him call collect."

The Ted K Archive

Michelle Megna

Knight Ridder

Web site keeping America posted

The Smoking Gun gives the details behind scandals and crimes.

14 Mar 2003

The Hour. <<https://books.google.co.uk/books?id=uQ4hAAAIBAJ&pg=PA18>>

www.thetedkarchive.com